COMMENTARY

Losses were widespread across financial markets in March amid growing uncertainty surrounding trade policy and its likely effect on economic growth and inflation. Throughout the month, the U.S. administration announced several new tariff measures targeting major trading partners. Furthermore, in April, the administration announced 10% universal baseline tariffs, as well as reciprocal tariffs on roughly 60 countries. These actions have brought about an escalating trade war that is beginning to have a noticeable impact on business investment and consumer confidence. Equities generally finished down heavily, led by the U.S., but a major outlier to the risk off sentiment was the strong performance of emerging market equities which finished up positively again.

The AIA Global Multi Factor Equity Fund returned -4.32% for March, outperforming its reference index (MSCI World Index) by 13 basis points.

Looking beyond March, the first quarter saw very mixed performance across and within asset classes. At the very start of the year, markets appeared set for another period of U.S. large cap tech dominance, supported by expectations for pro-growth policies and interest rate cuts. However, the emergence of Chinese Artificial Intelligence company DeepSeek triggered a sell-off in the U.S. technology sector and escalating trade tensions paved the way for numerous themes to play out for the rest of the quarter. Among those themes was a large momentum unwind leading to rotation from cyclical sectors to defensive sectors, as well as a rotation from U.S. stocks to better valued European and Emerging Market stocks.

In terms of generic factor performance, March saw large gains for Minimum Volatility Factor and Value Factor, smaller gains from Size Factor, but losses for Momentum Factor and Quality Factor. Over the quarter, Minimum Volatility Factor and Value Factor were again the top rewarded generic factors, Size Factor and Momentum Factor finished flat, while Quality Factor finished down. Minimum Volatility's Factor low beta exposure was the most rewarded over both time periods given the heavy selloff in stocks while Value also gained well from the continued rotation out of more expensive cyclical stocks which adversely affected the more growth-orientated Quality Factor.
